

Can you believe 2020 is almost over?

I'm thinking everybody will be happy to see the back of this year. It's been completely and utterly ridiculous.

Mind you, this year has seen me travel a path that I never imagined I would travel. I wrote a book. A freaking book! I still can't believe it and I'm not sure I ever will completely come to terms with that fact.

Every birthday, I often get a little melancholy, thinking about my achievements, or lack thereof. When I turned 51, it was no different, and then two weeks later, I started to write and I just kept on going. I'm not going to say it was easy, because it certainly wasn't and there were a whole heap of months in the middle, where the story would not come ... but I persevered. I know, with 100% certainty that on my 52nd birthday, in less than a month, I won't be feeling melancholy about my lack of achievements this past year. And that's because I wrote a freaking book. It's something I'm really proud of. Even if it goes nowhere, I did it. I started writing and I worked hard to finish it—and I achieved my goal.

I've also learned a whole heap of new things and met a whole load of amazing new people along the way.

I feel grateful for my life, my experiences, my achievements.

, what do you feel grateful for this year?

Until she meets Gabriel.

The lead singer of Cruise Control is sexy, funny, down to earth, and irresistible. He's everything Ariana could want in a guy—minus the fame, of course.

As Ariana is thrust into a world she wants no part of, she knows that what she has with Gabriel is worth fighting for, but being the girlfriend of a rock star is harder than she ever expected.

Can their love survive when the thing she's fighting so hard against is herself?
